Perception and Assessment of Left- and Right-Wing Extremism by Public Opinion. An Experimental Study

Paper for the 59th WAPOR Annual Conference, May 16-18, 2006 in Montreal, Canada

1. Theoretical Background

1.1 Political Extremism in Germany

Political extremism, in this paper understood as propaganda and actions against democracy and human rights, is a political and sociological phenomenon in many countries (cf. e.g. Ignazi 1997; Karvonen 1997; Varon 2004). This paper focuses on left- and right-wing political extremism, leaving religious extremism and other types of extreme ideology aside. The concept of extremism used in this paper is based on the according criteria of the German Federal Office for the Protection of the Constitution (Bundesamt für Verfassungsschutz), which is an intelligence service fighting extremists of all kind (Verfassungsschutz 2004). These criteria focus on action or propaganda directed against democracy. Right-wing extremists tend to focus on differences between individuals and people, value hierarchies and are prone to fascist ideologies. Left-wing extremists focus on the equality of individuals and people. They strive either for a kind of
