Introduction

Educational change is rarely easy to make, always hard to justify and almost impossible to sustain. Educational changes that enhance and enrich deep learning among students are particularly problematic¹ and sustaining such changes over time has presented severe challenges for educational reformers. Discussions of sustainability in educational change try to address these challenges, but they often trivialize the idea of sustainability by equating it with maintainability – with how to make change last.² This article develops deeper meanings of 'sustainability' and examines how far efforts to sustain change are in tune with the ecological origins of the concept.

We live in a complex and fast changing knowledge society.³ At the same time, teaching and school leadership are in the midst of demographic turnover and turmoil. These changes are not easy to control. They require different ways of thinking about change in human and natural systems than conventional approaches to planned change have allowed. This article therefore links our deeper senses of sustainable change to significant leadership issues in education to develop key principles of what we call 'sustaining leadership'.

Our work draws on a five-year program of school improvement involving six secondary schools in an urban and suburban school district in Ontario, Canada as well as on a Spencer Foundation funded study of Change Over Time? including leadership over time in eight Ontario and New York State high schools.
